On March 27, the Syrian army liberated Palmyra from the barbarians. No doubt it was a very important day for Syria. Moreover, after nearly two weeks, representatives of the Syrian government and opposition have paused peace talks in Geneva. The negotiations wrapped up at the end of a tumultuous week, revealing how far-reaching the consequences of the Syrian conflict are and the urgent need to find political resolution. The terrorist attack in Brussels, which left over 30 dead and more than 300 injured, demonstrates the need for a unified Syrian front against the so-called Islamic State. While the group has lost a significant amount of its territory and leadership, including its second-in-command, the Brussels bombing shows that it will become even more aggressive in its foreign operations as it loses ground, with some stating the attack in Brussels is an indication of panic in the group.

While no breakthrough agreement was reached in the peace negotiations in Geneva, the mere fact that the two sides stayed at the table for so long, all while a "cessation of hostilities" generally continues to hold in Syria, is a significant achievement by itself. The warring parties also came out of the talks with encouraging statements. According to Reuters, chief Syrian government negotiator Bashar Ja'afari was "positive" and believed the round of talks had "broken a diplomatic impasse." The coalition of opposition groups known as the High Negotiations Committee, a grouping that was formed in Riyadh in December and represented the opposition at the negotiations, has also reportedly stated that the talks have "laid the basis for substantive talks" for when the two sides meet again in April.

The tragedy that is the Syrian civil war, which by some reports has led to the deaths of at least 470,000 people and spawned an unprecedented refugee crisis, has torn asunder a society once renowned for being a mosaic of different religious and ethnic groups. Before the unrest in Syria started in 2011, Syria maintained a delicate ethno-religious balance through institutionalized tolerance and respect for minority rights. It also had a health care system that was "the envy" of many regional countries, a "healthy record" on public education and significant economic growth in the decade leading up to the civil war despite international embargoes imposed on it by the United States. Syria was also a critical factor in there being a stable regional balance of power. It strongly opposed Saddam Hussein's invasions of Iran and Kuwait and was a supporter of the Palestinian cause. Simultaneously, though, it maintained strong partnerships with the Sunni power centers, especially Turkey, Qatar and Saudi Arabia.

Of course, it goes without saying that Syria's political system was in need of serious reforms. These reforms, however, should have been pursued through diligent peaceful means, such as regional and international incentives, to avoid a total breakdown of political institutions. Unfortunately, this was not done, leading to the massive disaster we are witnessing.

Since Iran was first invited as a participant in the Syria peace talks last November, there has been substantial progress towards a final settlement, though major steps still need to be taken. "We adopted the notion of a transition for Syria. Russia and the United States and all of the other countries ... And I might add, one of the supporters of that particular approach both times in Vienna and subsequently in the meeting in New York and then in Munich is Iran, which also signed onto that," said John Kerry.

Here are seven suggestions that may help resolve the civil war in Syria, end the refugee crisis and alleviate the terrorist threat posed by ISIS to Europe and the rest of the world:

1. Full cooperation between the two coalitions fighting ISIS — i.e. the coalition spearheaded by Iran, Syria, Iraq and Russia and the one by the United States and its regional and international allies. This will assure cooperation among the key regional and international powers in the ISIS fight and is the only effective way to destroy the group.
2. In Syria, the ground offensive against ISIS led by the Syrian army and Kurdish forces should immediately be supported internationally and be intricately connected to Iraqi military and paramilitary efforts against ISIS. For that to happen, the Saudis, Qataris and Turks must command their proxy rebel forces to adhere to a complete ceasefire and allow them to cooperate with government and Kurdish forces fighting ISIS if possible.
3. In line with that, the Syrian government, opposition, as well as regional and international powers, should move beyond the current “cessation of hostilities” towards a formal and durable ceasefire. Parallel to this, prisoners should be released by both sides and humanitarian assistance should be administered to all areas.
4. International peacekeeping forces, numbering in the thousands, should be sent to guarantee the ceasefire and reopen the contested cities and towns to resettle as many displaced refugees as possible. Investing in the creation of such a force will be far cheaper to do than the billions spent to destroy the country and the cost of settling refugees outside of the country. In light of the proxy nature of the conflict, no Arab or Iranian forces should be a part of this peacekeeping force. A huge reservoir of forces exists in Asian, Latin American, European and African countries that could be used in this regard.

5. "We will not talk to anyone who talks about the position of the presidency. Bashar [al-Assad] is a red line," the Syrian foreign minister, Walid Muallem has said. However, the fate of Assad and the Syrian presidency should be left to the people of Syria through an election supervised by United Nations. In parallel, the opposition forces must precisely define who would negotiate for a national unity transitional government that would have full executive powers. This process will lead to a new constitution and ultimately to an internationally sponsored election. Terrorist and radical religious groups should be excluded.
6. There is a major need for a strong post-war rebuilding plan; a type of mini-Marshall plan that would foster stability during the fragile recovery period with economic support, enabling the re-inhabiting of destroyed cities and towns and preventing a chaotic and prolonged recovery.
7. The refugee centers in Jordan, Turkey and Lebanon should be gradually dismantled to prevent them from becoming a long-term security threat to the region, as refugee camps unfortunately tend to become. Every effort should be made to return refugees to their towns and assist them in reconstruction and participation in the political process.

For all these elements to succeed, there must be unity among the international community, specifically the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council. They need to control their regional allies and direct them towards these goals. Moreover, the Security Council should implement plans to stifle the deadly sectarianism spreading in West Asia. If not checked, it will have serious consequences for the entire world.

Sounds like an excellent plan.

But I do think Turkey is the wildcard in the deck. And a bad actor in general.

They clearly fear Kurds more than ISIS. And without some sort of compromise on Erdogans part I fear nothing is going to get resolved.

The EU is tempting Turkey ... Will they comply with its rules for civil society, press freedom, etc. ? As you say, the question is still open.

Thank you, Mr. Ambassador, for your cogent suggestions. This will be hard to accomplish, but at least it seems that Kerry, Zarif, Obama and Rouhani - and perhaps even Putin - would be on board. I wonder if Erdogan sees Da'esh as his main terrorist threat, or if he would rather just concentrate on the PKK.

A negotiated solution is the only one with any chance at success. I like the idea of trying to find some way the refugees can return to their homes safely and protected, but getting troops from around the world to participate would be, I think, quite difficult; and moreover, would all the myriad factions really trust them ?

That said, I thank you again for your suggestions; we must remain optimistic.

The international troops would be excellent targets for lunatics like ISIS.
